Is First Woman Professor Of Princeton In 212-Year History

For the first time in its 212-year history, Princeton University has listed a woman in its catalogue as a full professor.

She is Dr. Hannah Arendt, fifty-five, 130 Morningside Drive, New York, who commands three titles in the new 1958-1959 undergraduate catalogue. They are Class of 1932 Visiting Lecturer in the Special Program of the Humanities; Visiting Professor of Politics, and Visiting Senior Fellow of the Council of Humanities.

Dr. Arendt, who came to the United States in 1940 to flee from Jewish persecutions in her native Germany, will teach American humanities in the spring beginning in February, says the New York Herald Tribune. Although she is listed as a professor and will receive the salary of a full professor — about $5,000 for one term — Dr. Arendt is not a member of the university faculty.

She was so listed in the catalogue, a university spokesman

Bond Issue Of Israelis Will Help New Immigrants

To help pay for the settling of 30,000 unexpected immigrants who will arrive in Israel in the next six months as a result of changes in policy in East European countries, the Cabinet decided to recommend a special immigration bond issue of 20,000,000 Israeli pounds ($11,100,000).

This marks the first time that Israelis will be asked to give directly to the costs of settling immigrants, says the New York Times. However, a portion of Israeli tax money has been used indirectly for immigrant housing and other social needs. In the past the Jewish Agency for Israel, the action group of the World Zionist Organization, has provided virtually all the funds for immigrants. The Agency receives its funds through contributions, particularly from the United Jewish Appeal.

Restrictions on Jewish emigration from Rumania are being lifted, there is an increase in emigration from Poland, and emigration from Hungary is expect-

On Anniversary Of 1938 Nazi Pogrom German Leaders Deplore Anti-Semitism Of Today

The anniversary of Adolf Hitler's anti-Jewish pogrom in 1938 was marked by commemorative ceremonies in various parts of West Germany and by statements that anti-Semitism still is alive among the German people. Relations between 50,000,000 Germans and the small Jewish community in West Germany came under thoughtful appraisal on the twentieth anniversary of the massive Nazi pogrom known as Crystal Night.

The consensus of 100 leaders in politics, education, labor and science was that the German people had learned a great deal since 1938, but perhaps not yet enough, says the New York Times. The meeting at Bonn and similar conferences throughout West Germany were called to mark the synagogue burning and bloodshed of November 8 and 9, 1938.

The 1938 pogrom was a fifteen-hour orgy of destruction during which the Nazis burned or wrecked about 200 synagogues, smashed and looted thousands of Jewish places of business, murdered or beat many Jews and arrested an estimated 20,000 others. The event ushered in Hitler's mass extermination of Jews with concentration camp crematoriums and by other methods.

The name Crystal Night comes from the broken glass that carpeted German streets after Nazi fanatics had completed their rampage against synagogues and Jewish homes and business houses. The pogrom was in revenge for the murder of Ernst von Rath, a German diplomat in Paris, by a Jewish youth.

Many Germans, although these are a minority, are latently anti-Semitic, conferees at Bonn agreed. A great many more Germans were accused of closing their eyes to the past and forgetting "that as a people we are a murderer," as one university student expressed it.

On the hopeful side, the West German leaders assembled on the invitation of the Friedrich Ebert Foundation, an educational institution, found that the younger generation of Germans were freer than their fathers of the attitudes that led to the Nazi persecutions.

In Hamburg, a new synagogue was dedicated, with Max Brauer, mayor of the city-state, attending. The Hamburg City Council also met in a memorial ceremony. Sermons on anti-Semitism were preached in hundreds of Roman Catholic and Evangelical churches, says the New York Times. The Jewish communities in Duesseldorf, Frankfurt, Berlin and other cities also observed the anniversary. Twenty-five thousand people are now listed on the rolls of the Jewish communities in West Germany. Several thousand other Jews are not formally affiliated. There were between 500,000 and 600,000 Jewish citizens of Germany in 1933.

Dr. Hans Lamm, cultural director of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, stated the present feeling of his co-religionists at the close of the conference. "It would be more than human to expect the Jews to forget the years 1933-45," he said. "Within this reserve I believe it is fair to say we are encouraged and hopeful. It is now possible for us to enter into a discussion with our fellow citizens and to look for a new relationship."

A number of speakers were less optimistic than Dr. Lamm. Erich Lueth, a Socialist party official in Hamburg and leader of the National Society for Christian-Jewish Cooperation, delivered the bitterest judgment when he said: "If a Jew were to ask me, I would advise him to emigrate from Germany."

At a ceremony at the Jewish cemetery at Bielefeld, Dr. Ernst Wilm, senior figure in the Westphalen branch of the Evangelical (Protestant) Church, delivered an address in which he said it is necessary to state, "with pain, grief and anger, that there are still very many people in Germany who, in self-righteousness and arrogance, do not want to hear anything about the violence and injustice of November 9, 1938."

At West Berlin, says the New York Times, Mayor Willy Brand said: "Only when the entire German people become aware of the monstrousness of what was done, can we hope that this most terrible period of our history will have been surmounted."

At Bergneustadt, forty miles from Bonn, Prof. Hans Joachim Iwand, a leading Evangelical theologian, said: "We think today of the Jews exactly as did the Nazis, only that we say we would not do the same thing to them any more."

Chancellor Konrad Adenauer took formal note of the twentieth anniversary of the nationwide pogrom that began the era of all-out persecution of the Jews in Nazi Germany. In a letter to the Central Council of Jews in Germany, the Chancellor said the suffering that National Socialism had brought to the Jews could not be cancelled out.

"But because of this, it was, and is, a special desire of the Federal Government to compensate at least for material losses so far as possible," Dr. Adenauer said. "The

Noted Israeli Historian Freed Spinoza From Ban Of 1656

Prof. Joseph Klausner, noted Hebrew historian and writer, who died in a hospital at Tel Aviv, Israel, at the age of 84 years, was the last known survivor of the delegates to the first Zionist Congress in 1897 at Basle, Switzerland, which marked the start of political Zionism, says the New York Times. In 1949 Dr. Klausner was the sole opponent of Dr. Chaim Weizmann in the elections for the first President of Israel. As the candidate of the Nationalist Herut party, he received 15 votes to Dr. Weizmann's 83.

Professor Klausner was born in a village near Vilna, Lithuania, now part of the Soviet Union and attended schools in Odessa, Russia; and Heidelberg University, in Germany. He settled in Palestine in 1924.

A founder of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, Dr. Klausner later headed faculties in Hebrew literature and history. His books have been translated from Hebrew into most European languages. His best known was a controversial book on the life and times of Jesus Christ.

He was co-chairman of the Hebrew Language Academy in Jerusalem; an honorary foreign member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences in Boston; and was a winner of the Bialik Prize, Israel's highest literary award. In 1949 he was defeated for the Presidency of Israel by Dr. Chaim Weismann.

In 1927, Dr. Klausner, as a member of the faculty of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, formally pronounced the release of Baruch Spinoza, the great-philosopher, from the excommunication imposed on him by the Jewish community of Amsterdam 271 years before, on the ground of heresy.

The occasion was the 250th anniversary of Spinoza's death. "Baruch Spinoza, our brother art thou; I declare thee free!" Dr. Klausner stated in lifting the ban.

Despite Protests, Threat, Rabbi Flays Va. Racial Policy

Despite protests and one threat of violence, a rabbi in Virginia reiterated his condemnation of the state's racial segregation policies. Rabbi Emmet A. Frank, of the Beth El Hebrew Congregation in Alexandria, delivered a sermon describing segregation as "sin." He spoke on the same theme three weeks ago.

Rabbi Frank was scheduled to address the Unitarian Church in Arlington County, Va. A telephoned bomb threat emptied the church and forced cancellation of the program, says the New York Times.

In his protested sermon Rabbi Frank acknowledged that "a large number of people profess a segregationist philosophy." But he went on:

"Since when do numbers legitimatize sin? Sin is sin, regardless of numbers. Since when would we legitimatize stealing because it would be widely practiced? Since when would adultery become the righteous way of life because it would be widely practiced?

"Since when does a 'massive resistance' program of inequality and suppression of a group of God's children become legitimate or godly because large numbers follow its intolerant doctrine?"

The "massive resistance" program, developed by the dominant Democratic organization in Virginia, has so far prevented admission of any Negro children to white schools. Schools have been closed in three cities over the issue.

Rabbi Frank said that he has been heavily criticized by "extremists within this congregation and without." Some of the objections have come from those who favor segregation, he said, reports the New York Times. And he said others have come from persons who say his strong views will "bring a wave of anti-Semitic attacks."

"To these extremists," the rabbi said, "I say I will not be a part of their abortive attempt to expurgate Judaism of justice. Even though the attack is staggering, a Jew who remains silent in the face of prejudice leveled at another group of God's children is traitorous to the basic principle of Judaism."

The growth of anti-Jewish agitation in the South is bringing anti-Semitism in America back into public view, Arnold Forster of New York, national civil rights director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, asserted.

"Until recently," he said, "anti-Semitism had been fading steadily from the American scene, and anti-Semitic groups had taken on a fugitive character." Organized anti-Semitism seemed to have gone underground, he said.

Claimants For Theft By Nazis Urged To File At Once

A "substantial" number of Jewish refugees eligible for compensation from the West German government for personal property confiscated by the Nazis have not yet made application for payment despite the approaching December 31 deadline, the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany announced.

Saul Kagan, secretary of the organization, explained to the New York Herald Tribune that restitution legislation enacted by the West German Parliament affects "perhaps 100,000" former German nationals now in America, representing approximately half of those eligible for the 1.5 billion marks — roughly $360,000,000 — authorized for this particular purpose.

The relevant provisions of the Federal Restitution Law of Germany, Mr. Kagan said, are substantially as follows:

"The law deals with claims for compensation, in lieu of restitution, arising from the confiscation of movable property such as furniture, securities, bank accounts, foreign currencies, jewelry, precious metals, libraries, stamp collections, machinery, goods in stock, and the like."

Compensation may be claimed, he said, for such properties "confiscated outside the territory of what is now the Federal Republic of Germany (West Germany) or Berlin but that were subsequently transported into that territory or into Berlin. The confiscated properties must have had a minimum value of 1,000 Reichsmark." Proof of confiscation and of transportation into West Germany or Berlin must be submitted, Mr. Kagan said.

The law also provided compensation for goods confiscated outside Germany while in transit, provided that the owner is an emigrant from what is now West Germany or West Berlin.

The deadline for filing claims, which has already been extended from March 31 to December 31, is not likely to be extended further, Mr. Kagan said. He urged possible claimants to communicate at once with lawyers experienced in the field of idemnification, or, for those who cannot afford private counsel, with the nearest office of the United Restitution Organization, so that proper application may be submitted to the appropriate German authorities before the deadline.

In some cases, he told the New York Herald Tribune, detailed information about confiscated personal property can be obtained from the Fonds Social Juif Unific, 19 rue de Teheran, Paris 8; the Aide aux Israelites Victimes de la Guerre, 121A Chaussee de Charleroi, Brussels; or from Jockos, Herengracht 603 III, Amsterdam C.

HIMEL-SHAPIRO

The marriage of Miss Marilyn Shapiro, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Shapiro, 145 Everden Road, to Alan Himel, son of Mr. and Mrs. Isadore Himel, 487 St. Clements Avenue, was solemnized at Beth Tzedec Synagogue, at half-past five o'clock, on October 9, by Rabbi Stuart E. Rosenberg. The bride was given in marriage by her father. Her long ice-blue, peau de soie gown was fashioned with a sheath skirt ending in a chapel train; trapeze back; and short-sleeved, fitted bodice with a draped, square neckline. Her illusion veil was caught to a coronet of seed-pearl-beading and iridescent sequins and she carried a spray of pink camellias and white carnations. Miss Judith Shapiro, sister of the bride, was maid of honour, in a cornflower-blue, princess gown which had a full skirt trimmed with matching chiffon. She had a matching bandeau and carried a nosegay of tinted blue and white carnations. Mrs. H. Harris, matron of honour, wore a cornflower-blue, silk sheath trimmed with matching chiffon, which shaped into a harem skirt in back. She had a bandeau of matching blue; and carried a nosegay of tinted blue and white carnations. Herbert Nyman, brother-in-law of the groom, was best man. The ushers were, Gerald Shapiro, cousin of the bride; Pearce Lettner, Hershel Harris, Edward Schep, Norman Climans, and Philip Levitt. Blue and white chrysanthemum standards banked the altar and adorned the canopy and the aisle. A dinner and reception followed in the Synagogue Hall. Mrs. Shapiro wore a silver-blue, delustered satin sheath, with two panels of matching silk chiffon at the back, and a pill-box of matching material; with an orchid corsage. Mrs. Himel was in powder-blue peau de soie, draped with matching silk chiffon in back; with a matching hat, and a wrist bouquet of orchids. Mr. and Mrs. Alan Himel spent their wedding trip in Nassau and cruising through the Bahamas, the bride travelling in a navy-blue silk ensemble, with a white turban. They will reside in Windsor, Ont., where Mr. Himel is with the Canadian Broadcasting Company. Among the wedding guests were: Mr. and Mrs. J. Pleszowski and son, of Tel Aviv, cousins of the groom; and Mr. and Mrs. H. Landau, of New York.

THE FEATHER BUYER

BY SOPHIE SIMANOWITZ

The Market Place in Kranskroon was a favourite haunt of Abram Petlowitz, the Hebrew teacher. In the early morning, while his family still slept, he would wander there, exchanging gossip with the farmers, or on the look-out for a "bargain."

Everything from the proverbial "needle to an anchor" was bought and sold there, and many and varied were the articles which Abram picked up for a shilling and brought home to a protesting wife. Those were the days of the ostrich feather boom, before the terrible slump which ruined so many. Farmers and speculators were making fortunes.

It was told that a five-pound note meant so little to the ostrich feather millionaires that a poker player had used one as a spill to light cigar. One morning, Abram who was up early and had nothing in particular to do strolled over to the market place. As he arrived a horse was being auctioned.

A farmer friend remarked jokingly to Abram, "Why don't you buy that horse? Then you can also go on the road to buy feathers and make your fortune." Abram laughingly nodded his head — and the next moment found himself the possessor of the quadruped, for the animal in question could hardly have been dignified by the proud name of "horse."

It could scarcely walk and when it stood still — as it did almost all the time — its whole body drooped. Every moment it appeared to be on the verge of a total collapse.

But Abram, having acquired the animal, was not to be put off by its appearance. "One or two good feeds and he will look quite different," he assured himself. By dint of coaxing, persuasion, and a good deal of pushing and pulling, helped by all the little coloured boys of the neighbourhood, he managed to get the horse home, where he exhibited it with pride to the family.

Its arrival was greeted with acclaim, each member wishing to ride it immediately, except Rachel, his wife, who merely wanted to return it to its previous owner at once. Eventually a compromise was reached. She was persuaded to give the horse a trial and the children were promised rides at the week-end.

Having a horse, it was now necessary to obtain a cart. "More expense," grumbled Rachel. She did not think much of Abram as a trader in ostrich feathers, but admitted it could not be much worse than teaching Hebrew for ten pounds per month. Fortunately, a neighbour came to the rescue with the loan of an old cart which he was not using and presented Abram with a set of harness which, as he put it, "was just taking up room in the stable."

Early Monday morning, Abram having obtained a fortnight's vacation from the school (he was afraid to leave until he saw how things were going to be) with the help of the family, began to "inspan" the horse. The latter, looking as melancholy as ever, stood docilely while the harness was put on.

None of the family had any experience of horses or carts, but they worked with a will, and at the end of an hour the job was completed. Then they stood back to admire their handiwork, and a gasp, followed by a shout of laughter came from all of them.

The horse, as sorrowfully as before, stood looking at the cart while his rump faced the outer world. Even he seemed to appreciate the indignity of his position, for he drooped more than ever. Short of letting the beast push the cart with his head — a job for which he was obviously unsuited — there was nothing for it but to begin all over again.

With the help of a friendly neighbour and accompanied by sarcastic encouragement from Rachel, they succeeded at last in getting the horse to face the right way. Then, after giving it food and drink and followed by the good wishes of the family, Abram was on his way. The venture was not a success.

After visiting neighbouring farms daily for two weeks, all Abram had to show for his diligence was a large circle of friends and a horse which threatened to eat him out of house and home. Wherever he went he was welcomed, particularly when it was known that he was a Talmudic scholar and well versed in knowledge of the Old Testament.

Those were pre-motor car days — at least in the country districts. A car was still a novelty and to many, the invention of the Devil, and the average farmer went into the town but seldom. When he did go, he left as soon as possible, for the journey home was frequently long and tedious.

He had little or no time for the chat which he dearly loved. The traders who visited him were always ready to talk, but their conversation consisted of discussions on the ruling prices of the day and the weather, with an occasional reference to the war which was then slowly drawing to a close in Europe.

To them, Abram's visits were like a breath of fresh air to a prisoner in a musty dungeon. He had not only read his Bible as much as they, as well as all the possible commentaries, but he also knew and understood what he had read. He could discuss and argue the smallest detail with them, and was prepared to go on arguing and discussing as long as they were.

Here indeed was a man after their own hearts. What did it matter that his religion differed from theirs? They, like him, were firm believers in the Old Testament, living according to its teachings, and what difference did it make that they believed the Messiah had come and would return, whereas he believed He was still to visit the world? That could be settled later.

What concerned them now was his interpretation of what the Almighty had said to His people as written down in a particular verse in a particular chapter in the Book. Chatting away about the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, or discussing the wisdom of Solomon, who could introduce a discordant note by mentioning a parcel of feathers or such mundane matters as money or trade?

Certainly not Abram, who delighted in finding a more appreciative audience than the pupils in his class, and certainly not the farmer, who drank in his words greedily and, when he had had his say, countered with arguments of his own. So the day wore on until the time of Abram's departure, with a promise of a further visit in the near future, or until it was too late to venture home along the unlighted country roads.

When this happened they would talk far into the night until the candle guttered or the lamp went out for lack of oil — or until the farmer's wife called him to bed with a reminder of the work to be done the next morning. Was it a wonder that Abram soon found himself out of pocket?

Not that the farmers were mean. They fed and watered his horse, loaded him with presents of eggs and butter for his family; they merely could not bring themselves to waste time talking business to him. So all he had for his fortnight's work was the horse, which despite all the care lavished on him, looked as mournful and woebegone as on the day of his arrival.

"Now I know why they say a person eats like a horse," complained Rachel, after calculating what the animal's feed had cost them. "But where does he put it? He gets no fatter. He must be hollow inside."

The Friday before he was due back at school Abram was hurrying home in order not to be late for the Sabbath. Hurrying, that is, as best he could, for the horse had his own ideas on the subject. However much Abram coaxed, cajoled or threatened, the horse took his time.

What cared he for the Sabbath? All days were the same to him. As the morning wore on, Abram grew anxious. The previous day, realising that his fortnight's leave was almost at an end, he had gone to a farm which he had not visited before.

Mistaking the road, he had arrived late and been forced to stay the night. He had wished to make an early start, but the hospitable farmer had insisted on his not making a move before he had breakfasted.

The road was long; it was nearly one o'clock and he was yet several miles from Kranskroon. "Come along Beauty," he coaxed. Beauty — what a name for a horse such as this. But the children had insisted. But Beauty had other ideas. Instead of "coming along" as requested he stopped altogether; head drooping, legs almost buckling under him.

"What's the matter? Why don't you go on?" enquired Abram impatiently. Across their path lay a small river bed. On their outward journey it had been dry, but rain had fallen during the night, and now the stream sang merrily over the stones.

Running water was the thing above all others which Beauty detested.

Nothing on earth could persuade him to walk through a river or stream — as Abram had frequently found to his cost. "Over we go, Beauty," he coaxed optimistically, but Beauty refused to budge. No pleading or begging on the part of Abram could get him to move. There was no help for it. Abram must dismount and lead the horse across. This, too, was easier said than done. Each time he caught the rein at its head, the horse jerked away. After about ten minutes he moved forward a pace, to Abram's delight, but all he did was to bend his head and take a long drink from the river.

It was getting late and Kranskroon was several miles away. If he delayed much longer he would have to ride on the Sabbath. There was only one thing to be done. Taking his pack from the cart, he slung it across his shoulder, and with a final look of exasperation at the horse, who gazed back at him mournfully, Abram abandoned him to his fate and set out to walk to Kranskroon.

After trudging about three miles, he was picked up by a passing traveller and taken home, where a tearful and anxious Rachel awaited him. "This is the end," she announced, when Abram, having bathed and changed, told her the story. "No more feather buying. You're going back to teaching Hebrew, and the horse goes to the market."

Abram was too tired and dispirited to argue, and Rachel, satisfied that she had won her point said no more. Later that night, however, as she was dozing off, a chuckle came from the pillow beside her and a muffled voice said:

"You'll first have to get him to cross the river."

She sat up in annoyance and looked at her husband. But he lay with his eyes closed, a little smile on his lips, apparently fast asleep!

Up in the air about cocktails?

To be on safe ground with your cocktails—to make Martinis your guests will purr about, Manhattans they'll rave about and Gibsons they'll admire—use the same formulas the professionals do.

And many professionals will use nothing but Bright's Dry Vermouth or Bright's Sweet Vermouth, as the case may be. Because they know that these are as fine Vermouths as are bottled anywhere, carefully blended, carefully aged wines made with twelve rare and expensive herbs imported from four continents.

Judaism In Japan

BY RABBI MORRIS N. KERTZER

We are witnessing these days a significant turning point in the history of man's mobility — the beginning of commercial trans-oceanic jet flights. The shift from a 350-mile-an-hour pace to 550-600 mile-an-hour means that London is five hours from New York (the elapsed time of most fund-raising dinners); Tokyo ten hours from Los Angeles, and Chicago ten hours from Tel Aviv. For the first time in human history, no place on earth is more than a day away from any other. The line in Bialik's poem, "There are still remote, forgotten cities of dispersion," no longer applies.

This is a good time, then, for American Jewry to acquaint itself with some of these "remote forgotten cities" of Jewish life. Are there Jews in India, in Thailand, in Hong Kong, in Japan? What is their mode of life? During the past few months, many American Jews circled the globe, as I did, and perhaps some of them paused long enough in their tour of mosques, palaces and bazaars to ferret out signs of Jewish life. Occasionally, discovery is purely fortuitous, as when the guide on an Istanbul sight-seeing bus announces: "This is called the Karaite Square after a Jewish sect which flourished in old Constantinople." The Jewish tourist scratches his head and remarks to his neighbor "Who in the world are the Karaite Jews?"

The diligent searcher will discover that Japanese Jews have their own Catskill resort — Karazava (same elevation as Kiamesha Lake) — where Tokyo Jews send their wives and children for the summer and the husbands come up for weekends. He will learn that in many Indian cities like Jalpur, Simba and Juragadh, there is one Jewish family; that one of the world's great capitals, New Delhi, does not have a single Jewish family in the business world, because of a long-standing tradition that Jews join the military establishment, the railways or general governmental service. With some energetic exploration, he may eat kosher chicken chowmein on the patio of a Hong Kong Jewish club while gazing on a most exquisitely beautiful panoramic view. He will see the Moshe Building in Kobe, Japan; the man who gave the name to the five-story office structure is an observant Baghdadi Jew, whose wife and seven young children live in a beautiful mansion in the hills of Kobe. Mr. Moshe provides himself with kosher poultry by doing his own ritual slaughtering; his lovely home also contains a Mikvah, and is only a few yards away from the synagogue and center used by the 35 families of Kobe.

There is a kind of ephemeral quality about many of these Oriental communities. Despite the fine physical facilities provided for Kobe's Jews, much is missing. They are enclaves within enclaves; Jewish children attend Catholic schools (where they are excused from religious instruction), and their basic language is English, not Japanese. None of them is a Japanese citizen; they may carry Syrian passports one year and Israeli the next. All are in the import-export business, and their horizons are international. At high school age, children may be sent to Seattle or Vancouver, not only for educational advancement, but more especially for social contacts.

Tokyo's Jewish population consists of 150 families, of whom 110 belong to the Jewish Community Center. As in other parts of the world, Jews in Hong Kong, New Delhi and Tokyo are clustered institutionally, largely for social and cultural reasons. The Tokyo Center has many of the marks of a Jewish country club. Staffed by no less than 35 people, the club boasts of superb dining and recreational facilities. Sitting at an umbrella-covered patio table on a July evening, you imagine that you are dining at the Tavern-on-the-Green in New York's Central Park, except that you are enjoying blintzes and sour cream while you look below at the attractive swimming pool.

Next evening, while you sit in the last row of the synagogue, a backward glance into the foyer causes your eyes to fall on the bar, with two attendants. It may seem incongruous for a minyan of Jews to be praying and fasting on Tisha b'Av, the Day of Lamentation, whole others enjoy a whisky and soda; or to join a group chanting songs and eating gefülte fish at the kosher table, while a few feet away another group will be playing gin rummy. But the Center, after much travail, has determined to be all things to all Jews.

The building and spacious grounds were acquired a few years ago, when Tokyo was still licking its bomb wounds inflicted by Doolittle's B-29's, and their value has increased 1,000 per cent. I would hazard the guess that each member has an equity of over $5,000 in the real estate alone.

The Tokyo community is constituted almost entirely of Russian Jews, who formerly lived in Shanghai, Tientsin, and the Manchurian cities of Dairen and Mukden. They are successful importers and exporters, and find their relaxation in being together, enjoying Jewish food, conversing in Russian and Yiddish, and playing cards. Here, as in many such communities, the bridge table is the main hallmark of Jewish life. The attractive library has many books, but almost none of Jewish content. I was tempted to change the sign at the gateway to read: Tokyo Jewish-Style Community Center.

Religious life was probably enhanced by the arrival of a rabbi from England, in time for the High Holy Days of 1958. He is Orthodox, and his lot will not be an easy one, faced, as he will be, with the task of reconciling different outlooks. No Jewish community is too small for the widest sort of religious spectrum. One of my tablemates at the Tokyo Center, quoting liberally from the Talmud, informed me that he had been boycotting the religious services for over a year — and was adopting a "wait and see" attitude about the new rabbi.

On one Friday evening in August, half of the worshippers were non-Jewish Japanese; among them, the now famous Professor Kobayashi, Shlomo Nishiyama, and a 21-year old girl, Nabuko Uchida. Each of the three represents a different aspect of the newly discovered interest in Judaism among the Japanese.

Much has been written about Professor Masayuki Kobayashi (see Congress Weekly article by Hyman Kublin, October 22, 1956), professor of European history in Japan's largest college, Waseda University. I met with him frequently and I learned that his concern for Jews was both academic — getting the historical facts straight — and in community relations. He ardently sought a saner and healthier attitude of the Japanese toward Jews and Judaism. As Professor Kublin and Rabbi Max Eichhorn have written, the professor learned about the Jewish plight through his European studies in which he concentrated upon minority problems. Since his field was that of religious toleration, it was natural, he said, that "I turned eventually to the history of the Jewish people as the most typical minority in world history." One of his teachers, Professor Kazutami Ukita, a Yale alumnus, a famous publicist of a generation ago, once told him that "the most rational religion in the world was Judaism."

Professor Kobayashi was incensed at the rise of anti-Semitism among Japan's intellectuals (the masses have never heard of Jews or Judaism), and he traced the disease to Nazi propaganda that had been super-imposed on Czar-

In qualifying for membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations, publishers are doing more than providing advertisers with the facts about the circulation of their publications.

They are also giving active support to the principle that advertising space should be bought and sold only on the basis of verified information — a principle that has contributed in large measure to the interests of all advertisers.

The Canadian Jewish Review is still the only Jewish publication in Canada printed in any language reaching the Jewish community which is able to claim membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations.

ist teachings, which included the spread of the anti-Semitic forgery known as the "Protocols of the Elders of Zion."

Pleasant associations with American Jewish military personnel, especially chaplains, and through them with some outstanding Jewish literature, strengthened Professor Kobayashi's resolve to become a oneman public-relations agency on behalf of Judaism. He has mastered enough Hebrew to feel at home with the traditional prayerbook, and probably has a record of regular synagogue attendance since 1952 to match the most observant Jew. He loves "the delicious Hebrew melodies of the Rosh Hashana service." He finds in Jewish teachings "besides high ethical teachings, a kind of sane rationalism and elasticity which I couldn't find in Christianity." What he admired most in Jews was "the firm and self-confident attitude that they could hold even after the greatest disaster they suffered over these twenty centuries."

Dr. Kobayashi's major ambition today is to make available the treasures of Judaism to the Japanese-reading world. The visit of Dr. Maurice N. Eisendrath to Japan, early in 1958, an exciting event in Dr. Kobayashi's life, brought promises of a steady stream of religious literature, which has already begun to arrive. He has translated some of Professor Harry Orlinsky's works into his native tongue, and is now engaged in a Japanese edition of this writer's book, What Is a Jew.

Shlomo (formerly, Shigeru) Nishiyama is a personable young man, who is about to become a resident of an Israeli kibbutz. At worship I noticed that he followed the Hebrew text. He is director of the Japan-Israel Association, whose main concerns center on relations between the Japanese and Israeli peoples rather than on Judaism.

The third Japanese worshipper was the young Uchida, a curly-haired girl with all of the charm and grace which have earned the women of Japan a justified reputation for winsomeness and beauty of manners. Uchida's attraction to Judaism came from a search for a meaningful faith. She had rejected the Buddhism of her parents and, at 14, had become an Episcopalian. As a salesgirl in a Catholic college bookstore, she had met many priests, who belittled Protestantism as "full of scandal and deceit." Her Protestant mentors were equally derisive about Catholicism, and she had fled from both. Now she was studying Judaism seriously, and attending Sabbath worship faithfully. Would she become a convert? With proper encouragement, she probably would.

In an interview with Dr. Kagawa, the world-famous Protestant leader, said to me categorically: "I have Jewish blood in my veins, all Japanese do." His assurance caught me somewhat off-balance. "What makes you so certain about your Jewish origin?" He answered: "There is much historical evidence to prove it."

Some Japanese apparently find linguistic ties, the similarity of vowels and some consonants in the Hebrew and Japanese languages. The major form of Buddhism that is characteristic of Japan is Amida Buddhism. (Who knows its derivation?) The Mogen David is seen everywhere, apparently an ancient symbol. On the walls of Seiwa College auditorium in Nishinomiya, two huge six-pointed stars are painted on either side of the stage. Whatever the merits of the claim, some Japanese sense a historic kinship between their people and the people of Israel.

Jewish communities have come and gone in Japan. In 1923, the American Hebrew published an article by E. W. Nathanson, editor of the Universal Review of Yokohama. He reported enthusiastically about his own journal, about the Jewish Benevolent Society and the Jewish Sheltering Home, and declared optimistically, "There is undoubtedly a growing interest in Jewish affairs in our vicinity that augurs well for the future of Judaism in the Land of the Rising Sun." Like the aftermath of Ozymandias' proud boast "nothing remains" of Yokohama Jewry. Perhaps economic or political factors explain the disappearance, or possibly "interest in Jewish affairs," to use the editor's words, is no guarantee for the future of Judaism.

Japanese Christianity has grown very little in the past decade, while Buddhism has gained a new lease on life. The Christians number over a half million, and the Buddhists 43 million. Undoubtedly there are many Kobayashis, Nobukos and Nishiyamas seeking a meaningful faith. They may well be receptive to Judaism, but I question whether there are enough Jews who can supply them with basic instruction.

Is Japan ready for Jewish missionary activities? My answer would be that any effort should begin with the Jews themselves — we must win them back to Judaism first.

This article is from the American Jewish Congress Weekly.

DESPITE PROTESTS

But in the South a reverse process has started, Mr. Forster declared. He termed the recent bombing of a Jewish temple in Atlanta and segregationist and anti-Jewish meetings as "raucous and violent" public expressions of anti-Semitism.

Although such activities appear to break the tradition of tolerance for all religious minorities, Mr. Forster said, they have "no real effect upon the wholesome attitude of the average Southerner toward his Jewish neighbors."

FIRST WOMAN PROFESSOR OF PRINCETON

said, because she had held the title of full professor previously, at Brooklyn College, from which she resigned in 1955 to devote more time to writing. She has also instructed at the University of California at Berkeley and was a lecturer at Princeton in 1953. About sixty other women are listed in the catalogue in various capacities, such as lecturers, assistant professors, research associates and the like.

Reached at her home, Dr. Arendt was a little upset about all the publicity she was receiving, but denied there would be any problems in teaching the all-male student class. "I'm not at all disturbed about being a woman professor," she said, "because I am quite used to being a woman."

She has been a frequent contributor to periodicals and is the author of several books, the latest of which is "The Origins of Totalitarianism," published by Harcourt Brace & Co. in 1951. She is the former editor of Schocken Books and the winner of a Guggenheim Award in 1952, says the New York Herald Tribune. Dr. Arendt is married to Dr. Heinrich Blucher, a professor at Bard College.

Jewish Concept Of The Messiah

BY DR. JOSHUA TRACHTENBERG, RABBI OF THE BERGEN COUNTY REFORM TEMPLE IN TEANECK, N.J.

The messianic concept has been one of the most characteristic and fruitful Jewish contributions to the religious and secular thought of the West. Most widely known and most influential in its Christian version ("Christ" is, of course, derived from the Greek version of the Hebrew Mashiah — Messiah), the full range of its implications has been obscured by Christian theologizing, so that many informed persons are not aware that the Christ of Christian doctrine, though an outgrowth of Jewish aspiration, is not at all the Messiah of Jewish expectation.

The Jews never "rejected" Jesus as the Jewish Messiah — only a tiny group of Jews accepted him in that role; for the Jewish people he did not possess the attributes nor perform the functions of the Messiah. The Christian notion that the Jews have been merely "obstinate" in rejecting Christ, is based on the erroneous assumption of the identity of Christ-Messiah.

Whatever can be done to clear up that misconception, insofar as it may come to influence Christian thought, would be a distinct contribution to Christian-Jewish understanding. Christians can profit from a realization that their Christ has no affinity with the Jewish concept of the Messiah; Jews can profit from a clearing of the air which divorces their historic conception from Christian distortion of the term Messiah and reveals the originality and distinctiveness of the Jewish idea.

The most authoritative voice on this subject is that of Joseph Klausner, who was equally distinguished as critical historian of modern Hebrew literature, as an authority on the history and literature of the Second Commonwealth, which preceded the destruction of the Temple in 70 C.E., and as a leading public figure in the Palestine yishuv and in the State of Israel.

The publication in English translation of his volumes Jesus of Nazareth (1925) and From Jesus to Paul (1943) was an acknowledgment of his preeminence among students of the New Testament period. His volume The Messianic Idea in Israel (Macmillan, 1955, 543 pp., $7.50), which has been translated from Hebrew by W. F. Stinespring, professor of Old Testament at Duke University, rounds out his contribution in this field by analyzing the development of the messianic idea from its beginnings until the completion of the Mishna at the end of the second century.

The translator's aim was evidently, as with the earlier volumes, to make Klausner's scholarship available to non-Jewish readers. It may be hoped that it finds a wide audience among them and contributes to a better understanding of the Jewish position. The author, however, makes it plain that he is writing for a Jewish audience, and that his scholarly interest in this theme, extending over half a century, is directly related to his preoccupation with the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine.

For the Messianic concept embodies the spiritual, social, and political ideals which Klausner conceives to be inherent in Zionism and conveys "an idea of the close connection between the political redemption of Israel in its own land and the ideal of righteousness, peace and brotherhood among all peoples" and the "prophetic social outlook" which are to become "foundation stones in the building of our politico-spiritual National Home."

This, in his view, was the implication of the messianic idea for his own day, and Klausner, a lifelong active Zionist, and indeed the last surviving delegate to the first World Zionist Congress in 1897, was as competent as any to express the essence of the idea which prompted the emergence of the Zionist movement into the realm of practical achievement.

If one wonders how Klausner reconciled this with his adherence of long standing to the militant Revisionist program, and his readiness to represent the Herut party as its candidate for the presidency of Israel in 1952, one can only conclude once more that "politics makes strange bedfellows." That a man like Klausner cannot essentially be "typed" politically is apparent from his gracious dedication of the book to Judah L. Magnes, his political antithesis: "in spite of all the differences of opinion between us, I learned to honor his nobility of soul and to value highly his splendid deeds, in all of which his intention was for the glory of God." The true scholar is bound by his search for truth.

Klausner presents the messianic idea in its historic evolution, showing its uneven but steady development against the background of political and social conditions. Here indeed lies the unique merit of the book, for this is no mere critical examination of relevant passages torn from ancient texts, but a serious effort to relate the emerging components of this conception, increasingly varied and complex, to the objective realities of the periods which saw their birth.

The authors of the great Jewish religious literature of antiquity were very much a part of the life of their day, and their constant allusions to historic events, to the plight of their people, to their hopes for alleviation, and for recovery of political and material wellbeing, coupled with the expectation of spiritual and ethical exaltation for Israel and all mankind — the core of the messianic idea — these are adequately explained by Klausner's historic method, without the necessity of probing the murky depths of mystical insight and feeling.

These teachers "believed" implicitly in the reality of their religious outlook, and if their belief was deepened and enriched by their historic experience this was in line with the processes of normative Judaism which emerged after their time and in their pattern.

The author is thus able to show how the idea of a political savior, a strong redeemer of his people from political oppression, the product of the early unhappy political experiences of Israel, was refined and ennobled by the prophetic insights into the nature of man and the world. Besides political redemption they saw the necessity for personal redemption from the evil that rises within man. Thus, in their view, the redeemer was to be not only a great leader and ruler, but beyond that the embodiment of the highest spiritual and ethical qualities. And since evil is a universal human phenomenon, salvation and redemption must also be spiritual and universal.

To the prophets, therefore, we owe the introduction into the primitive hope for a triumphant leader of those humanitarian-universal and spiritual-ethical elements which distinguish Jewish Messianism. To the prophets also Klausner traces the Jewish insistence that salvation from evil must be achieved in this world, and that redemption is possible only through the improvement of the conditions of human existence, spiritual and material, on earth, under the leadership of an inspired human deliverer who, though acting as the agent of God, at the head of a revivified and purified Israel, can under no circumstances be conceived of as possessing attributes of divinity.

And finally Klausner discerns in the prophetic expectation of a Golden Age for all mankind "in the end of the Days," when man shall be "full of the knowledge of the Lord" and cease from wars and oppressions, the germ of the idea of progress in its broadest and most exalted sense.

This view, as Klausner carefully demonstrates with his meticulous examination of the Bible text, did not develop in a straight line, nor was it shared in all respects by all the prophets. Many of the prophetic writings do not speak of a human Messiah at all, but rather look to the Lord alone for redemption; others regard the collectivity of Israel, the people as a whole, as the potential "light unto the nations." Those who do anticipate the coming of an ideal human Messiah, a great political ruler of the House of David endowed with lofty ethical and spiritual qualities, do not yet regard him as the redeemer.

The Lord is still the only redeemer, and the King-Messiah is but the spiritual and political leader of the redeemed people, accepted as ruler by all the world because of his righteousness. These variations in prophetic messianic thought Klausner traces against the background of the political situation of Israel and the spiritual stature of each individual prophet.

The Apocryphal books, written for the most part before the destruction of the Second Temple, and lacking the spiritual force of the prophetic writings, but rather echoing and imitating the Hagiographa (the third section of the Bible), contributed little to the growth of the Messianic idea, but helped to preserve it. Indeed, in no book of the Apocrypha is there any reference to the personality of the Messiah.

The Pseudepigrapha, on the other hand, reflecting as they do the persecutions and tribulations of the Seleucid, Herodian and Roman periods, the disillusionment with the Hasmonean dynasty, and the terrible shock of the destruction of the Temple, and expressing an intense popular demand for vindication of divine justice and vengeance against the oppressors, are filled with obscure and fantastic apocalyptic visions which reveal a greatly intensified concern with the messianic idea, and are especially rich in messianic portrayals.

The messianic themes of the Scriptural writers were now embroidered in rich detail. The Day of Judgment, now becomes "the birth pangs of the Messiah," and the personality of the Messiah is expanded and portrayed in vivid colors. As Klausner shows, the "popular prophets," whose dreams and visions gave voice in the pseudepigraphical books to the deeply felt wish of the people, "broadened, even if they did not deepen, the messianic ideas of the prophets."

"Thus was forged that complete Messianic chain whose separate links are: the signs of the Messiah, the birth pangs of Messiah, the coming of Elijah, the trumpet of Messiah, the ingathering of the exiles, the reception of proselytes, the war with Gog and Magog, the Days of the Messiah, the renovation of the world, the Day of Judgment, the resurrection of the dead, the World to Come."

During the Mishnaic period, particularly after the destruction of the Temple and through the calamitous Bar Kochba revolt, Klausner expands this historical analysis further. Prior to the uprising against Rome he finds evidence in Tannaitic sources of a heightened emphasis on the political side of Messianism, culminating in Rabbi Akiba's support of Bar Kochba, even to the extent of proclaiming him the Messiah, though he was not of the House of David.

After the disastrous defeat of Akiba's champion and the onset of the Hadrianic persecutions the political hope evaporated, the messianic idea became increasingly associated with the pain and suffering of the "birth pangs of the Messiah," and a new figure, Messiah ben Joseph, a warrior-leader who is to be defeated and to die in the war with Gog and Magog, was introduced into the complex as precursor of the spiritual Messiah ben David.

When leadership passed into the hands of Babylonian Jewry, after the Tannaitic period, and later to the Jewries of other lands, the political aspect of Jewish Messianism receded still more and gave way to an increasingly mystical-religious complex of fantasies.

What stands out from this meticulously scholarly and well-reasoned account is that: 1) The figure of the personal Messiah came into the foreground only in post-Biblical times. During the Biblical period the prophetic emphasis was on the redemption of Israel and the ensuing reign of universal monotheism and righteousness. 2) Even in the post-Biblical literature, with all its wildly colorful imaginativeness, the conception of the Messiah remained entirely and firmly human. 3) During all this long process of development the essential emphasis remained consistently not upon the Messiah, who was never envisioned as anything but an instrument of God, but upon the Messianic Age, when "God himself will bring redemption."

For all its varied and colorful history, the essence of Jewish Messianism has remained intact. Now that the events of our time have brought fulfillment in the State of Israel to one part of this essence, the other, as Klausner rightly insists, demands our loyalty. Jews may still hope that Israel will point the way toward the era of universal righteousness, faith and goodwill which the prophets envisaged, but however that may be, few Jews can resist the appeal of this dream fashioned in the early years of Israel's career. With renewed enthusiasm and hope, even in this dark and dreary period of human history, perhaps especially in such a time, approximating so closely "the birth pangs of the Messiah," we can hold fast to this essential Biblical tenet of Judaism, the faith that out of its dire need mankind will yet turn to God for leadership in fulfilling the Jewish vision of the Messianic Age on earth.

ed to be resumed. As a result, at least 30,000 more newcomers are expected within the next six months than had been anticipated.

At Herzliya, Dr. Dov Joseph, treasurer of the Jewish Agency, made a new plea for more funds. Addressing members of a U. J. A. "study mission" from the United States, he said a number of "unmet needs" were pressing the agency in settling immigrants already.

Nearly 110,000 immigrants are still living in Maabarot, the temporary shanty town of tin huts, he said. Some have been there for several years and it will take at least $90,000,000 to provide homes for all of them, he added. Dr. Joseph also said that only ninety of the 482 farm settlements established by the Agency for immigrants were self-sufficient.

The U.J.A. mission, which consists of a hundred Jewish business and philanthrophic leaders, will make recommendations on fund goals to the organization's annual conference, scheduled to begin Dec. 13 in New York, says the New York Times. For several years its contributions have averaged $80,000,000 annually.
